People don't function their best without enough sleep, and for growing brains, sleep is especially important. However, research shows that many teenagers don't get enough rest. A new report highlights the possible effects of sleep deprivation, revealing that high school students who sleep less than seven hours a night are more likely to engage in risky behaviors that can lead to injury.

The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) report analyzed data from 50,370 high school students in grades 9 to 12 and found that teens who slept less than seven hours a night were more likely to engage in risky behaviors, such as biking without a helmet, not wearing a seatbelt, riding with a drunk driver, drunk driving, and texting while driving. In contrast, those who got nine hours of sleep were less likely to take these risks. Experts recommend that adolescents aged 14–17 should aim for 8 to 10 hours of sleep each night. Since lack of sleep can lead to more injuries by increasing unsafe behaviors, researchers suggest that addressing these risks could help prevent accidents and emphasize the importance of sleep.

The report shows a link between lack of sleep and riskier behaviors, but it doesn't prove that one causes the other. However, it's not the first study to connect sleep deprivation to problems in young people. In 2014, the American Academy of Pediatrics officially recommended that schools start later so teens could get more sleep. This recommendation was based on evidence showing that not getting enough sleep can lead to behavior problems, academic struggles, and a higher risk of obesity. As TIME has reported, some school districts are taking this advice.

The report notes that some teens need more sleep than others and that lack of sleep may signal issues like sleep disorders, excessive phone use, or depression. To improve sleep, experts suggest keeping a regular sleep schedule, reducing nighttime light, and avoiding electronics in the bedroom.

The concept of celebrity has evolved. In the past, celebrities primarily included athletes, political leaders, artists, and movie stars who gained recognition through newspapers, television, and radio. Today, the rise of the Internet has introduced a new category of celebrities known as internet influencers. These influencers achieve fame by sharing content on social media platforms like YouTube, Instagram, and TikTok. Unlike traditional celebrities, anyone can become an influencer if they can attract enough attention online.

This trend is particularly popular in China, where many online celebrities use platforms like Weibo and Youku to share photos, post videos, and promote beauty and fashion products. Some have even turned this into a full-time job. A notable example is Dayi Zhang, a Chinese influencer who started an online fashion store on Taobao in 2014. Within two years, her income reached millions of dollars, making her wealthier than many well-known Chinese actresses and even some Hollywood stars.

Companies have recognized the influence of social media in advertising. Many businesses now collaborate with influencers to promote their products and boost sales. For instance, the clothing brand H&M partners with fashion bloggers and models on Instagram to highlight its apparel. Influencers like Julie Sarinana and Megan Ellaby are selected because their styles align with H&M's brand. Since these influencers have millions of followers, their recommendations feel personal and trustworthy, making them a potent marketing tool.

The rise of internet celebrities illustrates how social media has transformed the path to fame. Unlike in the past, when fame was reserved mainly for actors, musicians, and athletes, today, anyone with an online presence and engaging content can achieve recognition and financial success. As social media continues to evolve, influencers are expected to play an even more significant role in entertainment, advertising, and business.

Successful business operation requires people to work together and develop good teamwork. For team relationships to work well, high levels of trust are needed. However, how people build trust can differ from person to person, culture to culture. Therefore, becoming aware of this factor can help us improve trust with the people we work with. There are many ways of building trust, and the approach a person chooses might depend on the relationship he/she wants to build, the culture this person is used to, and the preferences this person has.
